On the Horizon

Last month Dr. Keusch attended the Atlanta Breast Surgery Symposium. Both aesthetic and reconstructive implant surgeries were discussed in great detail. New trends were introduced including the use of acellular dermal matrix in conjunction with breast implants. These natural dermal implants give improved coverage for more challenging breast implant surgeries. New types of silicone gel implants were also discussed. The form stable, cohesive implants are being widely used in Europe, Canada, and South America. They are not yet FDA approved in the United States. The Natrelle™ silicone gel breast implants employ a fourth-generation cohesive gel. They are round implants with three profile options; extremely low rupture rates have been identified. In light of the low rupture rates, routine replacement of silicone gel implants at specified times is no longer recommended. We do advise, however, that patients continue to perform self-examination, undergo annual mammography, and continue to follow with their doctors over the years.
